Behind Enemy Lines

Gilbert Broadbent

Behind Enemy Lines Gilbert Broadbent
This narrative is a genuine account of the life endured by an average prisoner of war during World War II in camps in north Africa and Italy. It also describes various escape attempts made and the author's own escape in September 1943, from a camp situated in the province of Marche, Italy, near the Adriatic Coast. The author recounts his experiences in living a nomadic life hunted by Fascists and German SS troops, and his close association with the friendly farming community of Central Italy and the Apennine mountain areas. His attempts to break through the Allied territory are described, also his eventual success in June 1944, when he, along with another English colleague and a Yugoslav, finally presented himself to the Allied Authorities at Terni, north east of Rome. ----- During World War II, Gilbert Broadbent was a signaller with the 60th Field Regiment Royal Artillery. He served in front line action in Iraq and Syria before taking part in General Auchinleck's assault on Rommel's forces in Libya in November 1941.
